Q: Should I create a new exception for the iOS library? Should I create a new exception for the iOS library? For example the AWK framework might throw `NSInvalidArgumentException` but on the other hand the `NSString` class might throw `NSInternalInconsistencyException`. Should I create a different exception for these in order to make that exception more specific? A: It is not a good idea to create a new exception for an existing one. For each exception you create, you should replace the name of the exception class to indicate the problem. For example, `NSInvalidArgumentException` should be renamed into `NSInvalidInputException`. If you have two exceptions with the same name, it is better to have two different cases within the exception class, so you can easily identify the cause: `NSInvalidInputException *type1 = ...; NSInvalidInputException *type2 = ...; if (type1 == type2) { // type1 == type2, use different approach } else { // type1 != type2, use common approach }` The compiler will check if the exception name is used in some of the cases, so it will warn you if you have two exceptions with the same name. I will leave as an exercise the naming of `NSInvalidInputException` for you. The last weeks have been tough. So, after a long and hard struggle with many sleepless nights, we have decided to close down the forum. For the last 8 years we have had a lot of fun playing the combined game, sharing funny stories, discussing our gaming experiences etc. We had many memorable games and nothing was more exciting than a board game evening with friends. We would not have expected that we will meet so many loyal and dedicated gamers in these 8 years but it's always been fun to discuss and share our experiences with the community. Recently, there have been a lot of fake news stories shared on the internet and some of them have been considered true, such as the "cheating" incident on the Under Development forum. We do not encourage cheating in any way and it's a big misunderstanding. Of course we do not support players who are found to be cheating! We as the admin team are working closely with the forum's moderation team and we want to ensure that there will never be any situation in

© Wikipedia I would like to begin this series of articles with a personal story about why I am writing this series of articles. Last year, I wrote an article about the "Spit on your Bible" meme and was deluged with requests for my help. I should probably add that I posted a version of this article without any edits and editing is part of my process. I also posted a version of this article with a few edits. I had been online for a few years in the 1990s, when this type of thing was not nearly as popular as it is today. I remember being greeted with articles like, "Sam and Sam, what are you in the middle of?", asking when people will know that they have a God-given, inerrant, infallible, inspired and authoritative rule of faith and practice. In the years after I posted the article, I didn't always preach how I write, but the topic of attempting to get people to understand an inerrant Bible was still on my mind. Then, just a couple of months ago, I published an article about the Ten Commandments being made by Man and later added a Bible verse to that article. The following article is about how it used to be. It is a fun read about the types of things that were published in the pre-internet days and discusses how it is different than it is today. It is also the precursor to my next article titled "What is a Tablet?" My internet search histories would lead anyone to believe that I am a historian and a teacher. In reality, I'm more of a computer nerd. In the 1990s I spent more time in front of a computer and didn't have the time to do a lot of historical research. I simply spent time reading articles from previous years and experimenting with the Internet. It became part of my routine in the 1990s to take a few minutes to read articles from a few years ago. They were typically long, detailed articles. They were usually very well written. I would read them in the following order: a. Articles written for the student or teacher of the Bible and not meant for the general public. These are usually very well written and researched. b. Articles written for the general public and/or pastor/teacher of the Bible. These are typically written in a more simplified style and often contain little or no research. The authors are typically looking
